2. Technology Receptor Capacity Building--are those activities that are essentially designed to enhance the capacity of firms, particularly the Micro, Small and Medium Enterprises (MSMEs), to identify their specific technology needs, to solve their technical problems and overcome their obstacles to the successful adoption and use of technologies arising from deficiencies in labor, management and organizational change. These include the provision of consultancy services and of access to information on technology sources.
3. Innovation Capacity-Building--are those activities that are designed to promote greater awareness of the value of innovation among firm managers and owners particularly of SMEs, and stimulate demand for technological and organizational change within firms, essentially through greater collaboration, partnerships, clustering and networking among firms and with knowledge providers. These include collaborative and systematic planning for future strategic technology investments for a particular sector/cluster as well as the sharing of diagnostic tools, best practices, and knowledge among firms and academic/government institutions.
